Resolute Rebrands as American Beacon Partners

The company reveals its new brand name and visual identity, reflecting its nexus point between the financial advisor community and select institutional-caliber investment management firms to help solve key challenges and make key connections for both

IRVING, Texas (September 4, 2025) – Resolute Investment Managers, Inc., a diversified asset management platform with approximately 40 years of experience and more than 30 affiliated and independent manager partnerships, announced today its new brand name, American Beacon Partners, and visual identity as the company enters the next chapter of its growth story.

Greg Stumm, president and CEO of American Beacon Partners, said: "With a rich history spanning almost 40 years, we have established ourselves as market leaders in client service, product innovation and manager research. Our new name proudly embraces our past and emphasizes our continued dedication to our true partnership model. We strive to provide best-in-class investment solutions."

Rebecca L. Harris, chief operating officer of American Beacon Partners, said: "No asset manager is created the same, so our approach to partnership is never one-size-fits-all. In some cases, the best approach to achieving scale is through an affiliate model, where an asset manager is acquired by our firm. In other cases, a strategic distribution partnership may offer a clearer path to growth and scale. With our extensive experience, we have the acumen to know which approach will make sense for different managers, fostering collaboration that opens new doors with important intermediary channels."

Ted Wozniak, vice president and head of Retail Sales at American Beacon Partners, said: "A beacon is a signal or a guide, particularly valuable when conditions are cloudy and paths are unclear, which today's modern markets have certainly become. Having 'beacon' in the company's new name was important to us from the outset when we first began discussing the possibility of enhancing our brand. Similarly, we view all of our relationships not as transactional but as partnerships, so embarking on the organization's next phase of growth as American Beacon Partners is a step we feel fits us well, and we're excited to tell our story under our new name to all who would benefit from learning about our approach."

Jay Schilling, vice president and national sales manager of Wealth & Institutional Sales at American Beacon Partners, said: "For advisors looking to solve their clients' most vexing investment challenges and reclaim time that would be best spent working directly with those clients, American Beacon Partners stands ready to assist. And for the investment management firm delivering differentiated exposures, smoothing the seas during choppy markets or finding opportunities for uncorrelated alpha where others have missed, we can provide the distribution, operational and administrative services that allow talented investment managers to manage their investments."

Paul Cavazos, senior vice president and chief investment officer of the company's affiliate, American Beacon Advisors, Inc., said: "American Beacon Partners' asset management platform currently includes more than 30 institutional-caliber affiliated and independent managers that cover the asset class spectrum, including equity, fixed income, alternatives, liquid alternatives and private market investments. The organization's technology and resources also allow it to deliver these strategies in a variety of vehicles, including mutual funds, exchange-traded funds, model delivery, collective investment trusts, separately managed accounts, private offerings and interval funds."

American Beacon Partners may be a new brand, but the expertise, experience and forward-looking thinking that the team brings to its efforts on behalf of all of the organization's partners remain unparalleled in the space.

Financial advisors will continue to be able to leverage the company's solutions-based approach, which provides access to innovative multi-asset class products and strategies across both traditional and alternative investment exposures.

Investment managers will continue to benefit from the company's flexible partnership models, allowing innovative managers to leverage American Beacon Partners' sales, marketing and client service capabilities to forge stronger connections with national, regional and independent broker/dealer firms and registered investment advisors.
